SYNOPSIS

This is a book about all kinds of families: those that support one another and those that tear each other apart, those we need to run away from and those we must return to, those bound by blood or even by love. Throughout these stories, relationships are laid bare in the most varied ways, regardless of the time or place in which the narrative unfolds. From feudal Japan to contemporary Brazil, one thing becomes clear across the pages of this book: there is no single kind of family, yet at the same time there is something that makes all of them distinct—for better or for worse.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

David Ehrlich was born in Detmold, Germany, in 1996, and has lived in Curitiba-PR since he was three years old. A book lover since childhood, he was a voracious reader, and reading became his favorite pastime. Currently holding a degree in Journalism from UFPR and a postgraduate specialization in Visual Narratives from UTFPR, he is also dedicated to writing, venturing into short stories, poems, videopoems, chronicles, essays, and academic papers, always in a state of continuous learning.
