SYNOPSIS

In this poetry collection, composed of four parts (Confessions, Images to Cast into Dreams, Interrogations, and Contemplations), poetic construction is treated as a tool to expand the dimensions of language and reality. In the first part, which opens with poems dedicated to poets of the Lusophone world, the compositions take the form of confessions; the second part consists of the poem that gives the book its title: “Image to Cast into Dreams” (a poem made of dreamlike imagery that engages in dialogue with the surrealist poetic tradition); the third part consists of a poetic game of questions (possibly unanswered); the final part is made up of sonnets (in this section, the book assumes a poetic stance of social critique).
