SYNOPSIS

After the end of a love story, someone begins to write. Across notepads, unsent letters, and reflections blending memory, science, and metaphor, an emotional map emerges of what remains after someone leaves. The narrator attempts to comprehend the territory she once shared with another: a house with unfamiliar rooms, an island that may have been destroyed, a country of two inhabitants who no longer share the same time. As the days pass, writing turns into survival. Each piece is a gesture of hope, an attempt to keep alive a story that might already be over. Between longing, humor, lucidity, and grief, this book is the diary of someone learning that to love is also to inhabit the questions left behind when love comes undone.
